Since the escalation of the Syrian Civil War, more than three million people have left their country. A majority of these people fled Syria to two neighboring countries: Turkey and Lebanon. The exhibition Apricots from Damascus intends to focus on a particular group of refugees who are struggling to start a new life - whether temporary or not - with their creative and intellectual labor such as artists, writers, musicians. The title translates, in Turkish, to “Şam’da Kayısı” which is part of an idiom meaning, “It doesn’t get any better than this.” In most Romance languages, the word for “apricot” is “damasco,” the sweet fruit associated with Damascus.

In the first stage of this project, Akın and Winchester commissioned artists to produce zines to be distributed in Istanbul with pushcarts that provide mobile services such as photocopy and lamination, alongside other alternative modes of distribution in public spaces. Issues will be published in three languages: Arabic, Turkish, and English. The project culminates with an exhibition in Istanbul hosted by SALT in December 2015, where the themes produced for the zine and documentation of the project will be displayed. The hope is that the exhibition space will work as a social space where - exiled or settled - Istanbul based artists will come together.

Apricots from Damascus is an apexart Franchise Exhibition in collaboration with SALT. Apricots from Damascus is a 2015-16 apexart Franchise Program winner, along with In Vitro in Copenhagen, Denmark (December 2015); Rum Retort in Bridgetown, Barbados (April 2016); and How to Make Space in Hong Kong, China (June 2016).

Atıf Akın is an artist and designer who is currently teaching at Mason Gross School of the Arts and runs his studio in New York City. Currently he is working on Mutant Space, a research-driven art and design project on radioactivity and nuclear mobility.

Dilek Winchester studied at Central Saint Martin’s College in London and is currently based in Istanbul. Translation, literature, language, drama, oral history, and emotional expressions are among the subject matters she deals with in her work.

apexart’s exhibitions and public programs are supported in part by the Affirmation Arts Fund, Andy Warhol Foundation for the Visual Arts, Bloomberg Philanthropies, The Greenwich Collection Ltd., Lambent Foundation Fund of Tides Foundation, and with public funds from the New York City Department of Cultural Affairs and the New York State Council on the Arts.
