Scientific research aspires to systematically build and organize knowledge, to explain and understand the universe. The role of art in scientific research was once very clear. Andreas Vesalius' detailed anatomical diagrams, for example, were produced by commissioned artists. The artists' presence at the dissections, help Vesalius to produce the first accurate set of diagrams. It was not only of much better quality than those produced previously but was also considered an instant classic.

The relations between art and science are not so clear anymore, and yet many artists use the language, tools and methods of scientific research. The exhibition argues that by adopting scientific practices and tools, the participating artists do not ask to understand the world, or merely observe outside of it, but rather to participate in the world.

An Unsolicited Proposal Program winning exhibition.
