CHANGE THE CHANNEL:
WCVB-TV 1972–1982

JANUARY 12–MARCH 5, 2011
CURATED BY GARY FOGELSON
& MICHAEL HUTCHERSON

apexart
291 church street new york, ny 10013
1, 212.431.5379 f, 646.827.7487
info@apexart.org www.apexart.org
WHDH was never sold to Boston's Channel 5, as it never got. They've had to make it a novelty of the public's knowledge to be able to compete with WHDH. With the help of the lawyer, they've managed to make a small-time movie like "The Traveler Corp." a hit. That's about all. Now they're going to try to sell the WHDH name to the public as a reality show, even though it's not. They'll use WHDH as a catchy slogan, but in reality, the show is a rip-off of the "Traveler Corp." format.

Another way to look at WHDH's undeniably by way of the diversions themselves. The station's programming is a mix of news and entertainment, with a heavy emphasis on local news and events. “The station’s news coverage has improved significantly in recent years, and it is a source of pride for the station.”

The Federal Communications Commission (FCC), in its role as the regulator of the broadcast and cable television industries, plays a vital role in ensuring that these industries operate in the public interest. The FCC's regulations and policies are designed to promote a diverse and vibrant media landscape, where stations are allowed to compete for audiences and advertisers. The FCC's role in this process is to ensure that all voices are heard, that programming is diverse and that the public interest is served.

The FCC's role in this process is to ensure that all voices are heard, that programming is diverse and that the public interest is served. This includes setting standards for programming and the use of broadcasting licenses, as well as enforcing rules against discriminatory practices and antitrust violations.

In recent years, the FCC has faced criticism for its role in media consolidation and its failure to adequately regulate broadcast and cable television. However, the FCC's role in promoting diversity and ensuring that the public interest is served is crucial to the functioning of a free and democratic society.

According to the FCC's regulations, each station is required to maintain a public interest file, which includes information about the station's programming and its role in the community. These files are open to the public and are available for review online.

In conclusion, the role of the FCC in regulating broadcast and cable television is essential to ensuring that these industries operate in the public interest. The agency's role in promoting diversity and ensuring that all voices are heard is crucial to the functioning of a free and democratic society.