Public Key: an encrypted art in a transparent society

The transparent society (or, in the more common term, the cybernetic society) operates on the basis of the concept of the transparent individual, in which all information about an individual's actions and decisions is accessible to others. This transparency is achieved through the use of advanced information technology, which enables the collection and analysis of vast amounts of data about the behavior of individuals. In this context, the concept of a public key becomes crucial, as it allows for the encryption of information in a way that can be verified by others without revealing the underlying data. This process is made possible by the use of advanced cryptographic algorithms, which ensure the confidentiality and integrity of the information being transmitted. However, the use of public key encryption also raises important questions about privacy and security, as it requires the establishment of trust relationships between individuals and organizations. In this regard, the role of the artist and the creative community becomes vital, as they can contribute to the development of new technologies and practices that can address these challenges and preserve the integrity of the transparent society.
A circle has been progressively mapped since the inscribed start of the real estate. The first is a point on a line, a gesture, an object that continues to produce a variation whose legibility can only be reached by its meaning. The second is to remain unended and distinct. The combination of those two has defined the dimension of the previous circle that now begins another circle.}

Richard Kurgansky

Emotional choices are often unconscious and political choices. Since 1911, the security and secrecy have been adapted in numerous ways to the needs of our collective emotional shock. Most of these practices undermine the concept of making secrets known. In this context, we are at the root of a larger political choice. The concept of making secrets known allows the power to question and knowledge the concept of making secrets known. In this context, we are at the root of a larger political choice. The concept of making secrets known allows the power to question and knowledge the concept of making secrets known.